Course Description

This course continues the coverage of topics in Social Psychology begun in PSYC1001 and PSYC2013. Topics covered emphasize evaluating theories and the relevant evidence, and they include antisocial behaviors, discrimination, the self, emotion, cultural psychology, evolutionary psychology, and existential social psychology. The course provides first-hand experience of research by involving students in a small group research project based on topics covered in the lectures. Students discuss issues pertaining to each step of the research process (e.g., ethical issues that underlie social psychological research, proper practice when collecting and handling data, and how to communicate research findings in written and verbal form).
