Course Description
This course analyzes differences in environmental policies and regulations in the United States and Europe, including different approaches to controversial environmental issues (such as the Kyoto protocol, global warming, fishing regulations, pollution abatement, and GM crops), the scientific and political processes for setting environmental policies, and the legal structures and institutions for implementing them. More specifically, the course explores U.S. and European attitudes and policies towards the sustainability of environmental resources, and the assessment of the costs, risks, and uncertainties of environmental regulation or deregulation. Finally, this course introduces tools for analyzing their effectiveness, advantages, and disadvantages, and engages students in discussions of controversies surrounding their use.
