Course Description

Domesticated animals have been identified in many societies across the world, but rarely have archaeologists considered how livestock management has shaped (and continues to shape) human societies. In the past, archaeologists have tended to assume that once established livestock can be disregarded as a dynamic factor. Such studies focus on the narrow confines of the economic significance of livestock produce, often associated with the animal's death. This course considers the agency of livestock and its importance in transforming human relationships. Examples and case studies are drawn from archaeology, but also from anthropology, history, and geography
