Course Description

The concept of trauma has gained increasing traction in the past decade, in the recognition that the impact it can have on individuals can be lifechanging. The Scottish Government for example now seeks to have all its policies based on a "trauma informed" mindset. Underpinning this is the understanding that adverse childhood experiences play an important role in the life chances of individuals. Academic research in this area is often inter-disciplinary, and feeds into government and 3rd sector policy. This course seeks to explore these new developments and introduces students to the different ways that trauma is experienced by both individuals and society.
