Course Description
This course takes a critical perspective about how we can think about law, society, and justice. The premise is that to understand law demands understanding society. The course holds the belief that such a contextual approach to studying law allows for a meaningful discussion about justice and what it pertains to in contemporary society. This course distinguished between and describes different perspectives on law in context, in particular with the major topics in law and society, and socio-legal theory. Students are taught different types of arguments such as theoretical vs. empirical and legally valid vs. philosophically sound.
