Course Description
This course explores psychological and social dimensions of environmental sustainability and landscape and ecosystem management. It examines the ways humans experience, interact, and behave in the physical environment. Students investigate psycho-social dimensions of human-environment interactions and consider frameworks for understanding landscape perception and environmentally significant behavior. The course covers psychological bases for environmental values, aesthetics and preference management, design implications of how humans experience a range of environments, environmental concern, and environmentally significant action and strategies for encouraging environmentally sustainable behaviors.
