Course Description
This course studies the development processes of Chinese society from the late nineteenth century until the present time broadly from a social science perspective. The course provides factual knowledge of Chinese society and a critical assessment of current academic literature on China, based on which some students may develop their own research interests. This is a seminar course for reading and discussing scholarly works on development processes of Chinese society. In addition to serving the purpose of a survey course, special efforts are made to provide thematic discussion of some major issues actively pursued in China studies. Students will be led to read a set of the English-language publications in refereed journals and books in the field. These publications are by large based on statistical analyses of survey and non-survey data in addressing questions of theoretical significance to the analysis of China's class transformation, socio-economic inequalities, mobility patterns, economic development and social problems among others.
