Course Description

This course aims to do a 'Law and Religion' studies from the perspectives of comparative law and legal history in the background of international law developments. It helps us better understand the relations between law and religion, or politics and religion. Students have an overview of law and religion in domestic and international background, make sense of the freedom of religion and separation between politics and church, and are deeply and sincerely motivated to undertake their academic training. The first half of the course is concentrated on historical investigation into the different doctrines regarding the relations between politics and religion, or government and church in any sense of any confession, and the second half is on many current issues in international law related to the course subject. Topics include Law and Religion in Christian Doctrines: Augustine, Aquinas, and the Salamanca School, Natural Law and God in the Arminian Doctrine, Hebraic Law and Religion in the 17th-Century Political Thought, Law and Religion in Baruch Spinoza, Islamic Jurisprudence, Economic Activities in Religions, and French/German/American/Islamic Experience in Law and Religion.
