Course Description
The course studies the global political economy particularly in the context of globalization, neoliberalism, and the recent global financial crisis. Students learn about the recent history of the global economy, how main features of it are changing, and how these changes are having an impact on the present. This course is built around the research areas of members of the Politics Global Political Economy Research Cluster. It examines a set of problems in the global economy and how they influence the lives of ordinary people all around the world, covering problems and issues that are crucial to understanding how the world is now, how it could be, and how it should be in the 21st century.
