Course Description

This course provides the conceptual inventory and practical tool kits that enable students to achieve circularity across organizational spaces. By integrating ethnographic methods with key concepts from entrepreneurship, the class equips students with the theoretical and practical knowledge needed to make transitions to sustainability. The course is intensive and follows a problem-based learning approach, where students develop solutions to a real-world circular challenge presented by a case company. The class requires active participation from students, with classroom activities and discussions as well as working in project teams inside and outside the classroom. It facilitates learning by participating, learning by observing, and learning by in-class presentations and critical reflections. Students are supported in their learning process with mentoring and coaching in collaboration with the Copenhagen School of Entrepreneurship.
