Course Description

There is wide consensus that Asia is a major engine of recent global economic growth. Does this mean that Asia is a new economic power, or that the current growth indicates the resurgence of Asia? The answer to this question requires good historical knowledge of Asian economy in a global perspective. This course aims to provide such knowledge.

The course focuses especially on Southeast Asia from the early time to the mid-twentieth century, discussing the following themes: natural environment; economic foundation of early states; changing demands in the global markets where consumption cultures were constantly changing; production development of particular products; regional and global trade; movement of labor; economic and social impacts of colonization, and struggles for economic decolonization.

To prepare for this course, it is recommended to enroll in the course offered in the fall semester, "Economic History of Southeast Asia," which focuses more on the developments in the post-WWII period.
