Course Description

This course covers processes and theories of government taxation, examining two traditional roles of government in relation to market mechanisms: the provision of public goods and services, and the provision of social insurance and income redistribution.

This course is not only about theoretical analysis of the abstract expenditure programs, but also about specific institutions and policy debates in Korean context.

First and second year levels of microeconomics are prerequisite. It is also recommended that students are equipped with mathematical skills related to economics.

Some of the supplementary materials are written in Korean, thus some Korean language familiarity is recommended; although the materials will be explained in English, some of the terminologies cannot be translated.
