Course Description

This course examines the complex relationship between politics and gender. It introduces various theoretical perspectives on the ways in which politics, public policy, and international relations are shaped by and contribute to gender dynamics. In particular, the course delves into the gendered and gendering nature of politically relevant phenomena such as representation, political behavior, and war and conflict. Moreover, by presenting empirical cases through a variety of methodological and analytical lenses, the course introduces a wide range of ways of carrying out feminist, gender, and intersectional studies of politics and policy.
