Course Description
This course offers a study of international organizations and their role in international politics. The course is separated into two distinct parts. The first part introduces central theoretical approaches that help to understand key aspects of international organizations such as their creation and design, their decision-making processes, and their impact and policy effectiveness. The second part applies this analytical toolbox to explain the role of international institutions in specific policy domains, such as security, human rights, health, environment, migration, and labor rights. The course focuses on the United Nations and related agencies and programs, with non-governmental and regional organizations being discussed as well. A relevant background in political science or international relations is required as a prerequisite for this course.
