Course Description

This course examines the primary responsibilities of Congress and its relationships with other political actors. Topics include the theoretical underpinnings of Congress, the rules and procedures that make Congress a unique form of national legislature, the behavior of members in Congress, and the course focuses both on academic study as well as practical applications to the real political world (for example, students will draft, submit, and present a bill proposal.) While this course centers upon Korean and American systems, conclusions drawn from discussion may apply to other systems and countries as well.
