Course Description

This course provides an introduction into the study of eco-criticism and environmental literatures. Students examine a range of literary and theoretical texts towards an understanding of the development and current issues in this growing interdisciplinary area of study. It examines topics such as the representation of landscape, pastoral, the social production of space, pollution, climate change, nature/anti-nature writing and recent work on interspecies relations. Examples for discussion are drawn from a range of genres that include fiction, non-fiction, poetry, and film.
