Course Description

This seminar is for students who are interested in political methodology, a subfield of political science focused on the development of quantitative tools for political analysis as well as their innovative applications. Building upon the basic statistical and data analytic skills acquired in Statistics I/II, students deepen their understanding of statistical methods and implementation essential for the quantitative analysis of political data through lectures, computer lab exercises, data examples, and in-depth discussions.

Students are assumed to have good mastery of the topics covered in Statistics I and II. It is strongly recommended that students review the materials from these courses before the class begins.
