Course Description
This course examines, in national and international contexts, the nature and prevalence of different crimes and social harms; the social distribution of different crimes and social harms in relation to both victimization and offending; and why and how some crimes are more visible in public and political discussions. Students examine the nature and prevalence of types of crime and harm in the UK and other countries; the role of social factors such as class, gender, ethnicity, and age in terms of both the experience of victimization and offending in relation to different types of crime and harm; and why, and how, some crimes come to dominate public, political, and policy discussions whereas others do not.
