Course Description

Taking Political Sociology as the main approach, this course explores the relevance of international organizations (intergovernmental and non-governmental), and how political and social forces interact and shape each other. The course provides a general introduction to international institutions, as well as their origins, priorities, structure, and means of action. The course places a special emphasis on the role of international organizations after World War II; globalization, and its impact on transnational governance and management of global threats or social movements. The course reflects on how ideologies and beliefs relate to the formation, management and responsibility of international organizations towards social problems, as well as underlying power structures.
