Course Description

This course explores the complex interplay between environmental issues, politics, and social change in the Arab world. It examines how natural resources, such as water, oil, and land, shape regional power dynamics and influence political conflicts. Through case studies, the course analyzes the impact of colonial legacies, globalization, and climate change on ecological and social systems in the region. The course also highlights grassroots movements and policy responses that address environmental justice and sustainability challenges. By engaging with interdisciplinary perspectives, students gain critical insights into the environmental dimensions of political struggles in the Arab world.
