Course Description

The issue of market provision and/or state provision provides a central and recurring theme in this course. Within each policy area covered, the course investigates market failure and government failure, via for example consideration of externalities, informational problems, and an examination of the public choice perspective with respect to possible government failure. Specific topics to be covered include but are not limited to a subset of the following: resource allocation (regulated markets and/or state); taxation; distribution, inequality, and poverty; economic growth, employment, and unemployment; regulation; care (formal/paid and informal/unpaid); competition; education; health; housing; aging; agriculture; and energy.
