Course Description

This course focuses on the experiences of children and young people living in "troubled times." Through consideration of case studies - for example, the lives of child soldiers or the case of unaccompanied child migrants - students explore the ways in which adversity and crises, such as armed conflict, affect the everyday lives, education, and mental and physical health of children and young people. Students consider how well normative theories of childhood enable us to understand the lives of children and young people. Particular attention is paid to children and young people's vulnerability in such situations and their need of protection, as well as their agency: their ability to shape their lives and those of their communities in incredibly difficult situations.
