Course Description

This course provides a foundation in both leadership and business administration, emphasizing various leadership styles and their application in organizational settings. Students from diverse disciplines — including sociology of work, economics, business administration, communication, and the arts — develop the skills needed to lead and manage organizations effectively by addressing the challenges of planning, organizing, leading, and controlling (POLC). Key topics include the evolution of management thought, business ethics, organizational culture, and social responsibility. A strong focus is placed on the ethical responsibilities of leadership, with real-world case studies examining how leaders navigate moral dilemmas and foster ethical practices within organizations. These case studies include examples from industries where leadership plays a crucial role in balancing business goals with broader cultural, environmental, and societal concerns. Students also explore how leadership can address issues like diversity, sustainable development, and the global impact on business operations. This course is ideal for students interested in management, economics, business administration, sociology of work, and communication, offering valuable insights into leadership, management, and the role of ethics in decision-making, with particular relevance to sectors connected to art, food, and society in Rome and Italy.
