Course Description

This course, designed as a series of interactive workshops, offers an opportunity to write in English within the student's own discipline and to discuss writing with international peers. It also invites students to reflect on writing habits and writer identity. Students choose a research problem to investigate and follow the stages of researching and writing as two interlinked processes: focus the research question, find and review relevant literature, and collect the best evidence to argue for the importance of the research project. The course also provides an opportunity to read like a writer by analyzing model texts and sample texts written by peers to better understand rhetorical strategies and stylistic conventions of selected academic text types. Students also practice writing and giving feedback through drafting four sections of the research paper (an extended definition of a key concept, literature review, argumentative synthesis, and an introduction), discussing these drafts with peers and tutors. The semester of reading, writing, and exchanging ideas with international peers from various disciplines allow students to become better academic communicators.
