Course Description
This course explores the development, behavior, and course of learning of young children and examines instructional methods for young children. Students directly teach young children through interaction, observation of instructional method, and daily work. This course is composed of two hours of lecture per week and four hours of practical training per week. The practical training is held at child development research institute where students observe instructional methods. They utilize knowledge in person what they previously learned from the lecture and record this process and discuss with each other. By connecting the theory of instructional method for young children with real life experience, students learn appropriate professional teaching method and concrete technique
