Course Description

Building on USSCPOL23, this course offers a deeper understanding of the sub-discipline of International Relations, focusing on its main concepts, issues, theories, and approaches. The question that guides the course is: At a time of significant change and instability, what theoretical approaches to the study of international relations are helpful toward understanding current problems of global and regional order? In this course, the focus is on understanding the changing world order. Examine the problem of order through various theoretical lenses, from realism and liberalism to constructivism, Marxism, and beyond. Be challenged to employ these tools toward thinking about how global and regional structures, which help shape how states cooperate and compete, might be reimaged for a changing world. At least one of the following course modules must be completed: [\[UCSSCPOL23\] International Relations: dimensions of world politics](#) or [\[UCSSCPOL25\] Political Economy of the Global South](#)
