Course Description

This course discusses political philosophy in general and the conception of justice in particular. The most prominent issues in political philosophy are ethical and political controversies as there are various theories proposed throughout history to solve them. In ethical and political theories, nothing is more important than the explication of justice. The conception of Justice is extremely complicated that it has become a subject of philosophy since its beginning in the world of ancient Greece.

This course addresses justice as a virtue due to the following three characteristics:

1. It is the only virtue that needs others to admit its validity; there is no concept of justice to be defined by any person alone.
2. It is a perennial issue in political philosophy. The debates about justice have lasted more than 2500 years.
3. It has been an issue in philosophy without a definite solution or even improvement.
