Course Description

This course questions the most generalized binary oppositions (State versus indigenous people, government versus community, etc.) that are loaded with moral values (“bad” State versus “good” people) through readings and reflections that provide a complex understanding of the relationships between law, right, State, indigeneity and anthropology. The class becomes familiar with the history and institutionalisation of the rights of indigenous peoples and Afro-descendants by analyzing case studies that show the possibilities and limitations of new legislation at national and international level. The course also examines the difference between multiculturalism and interculturality through different intercultural projects.
