Course Description

This course systematically explores family change and family policy. It covers the definition, functions, and theories of the family, analyzes the transformation of family structures from traditional to modern forms, and compares family models and policies in East Asia, Europe, and China. The course delves into issues such as marriage systems, intergenerational care, and gender roles, while also addressing social problems like family poverty and violence. Against the backdrop of the digital age, the course evaluates the effectiveness of family policies, envisions the future of family policies from a global perspective, and cultivates students' analytical and problem-solving skills.
