Course Description

In this course, students explore how anthropology contributes to understanding humanity beyond simply documenting ways of life in different societies. Students learn how anthropologists theorize, interpret, analyze, and explain different ways of life, make these ways of life understandable to outsiders, such as informing policy and development, and build a broader picture of the nature, capacity, and variation of humankind. Students also critically examine the limitations and assumptions of different anthropological approaches, helping them develop a nuanced understanding of the discipline's methods and contributions.
