Course Description

This course examines main concepts and methods used in environmental land-use planning. It discusses the relationship between abiotic, biotic, and anthropogenic elements of the environment, the supply and demand relationship, and its impact on essential resources such as air, water, and soil. This course analyzes planning and management of environmental resources, prevention of territorial imbalances, and maintenance of a population's quality of life.

Pre-requisites: Students must have completed and passed Natural Foundations of the Territory and Social Foundations of the Territory
