Course Description

This course covers international organizations and the laws that govern them.

International organizations govern many different aspects of contemporary international relations, from global security, trade, environmental issues to human rights. Crucial to these international organizations is the legal framework that gives these organizations power but also limits their authority. At the same time, the activities of these organizations also contribute to establishing customary practices that become the foundation for international norms and law.

This course covers the historical and theoretical foundations of international organizations and provides a comprehensive understanding of the establishment and activities of international organizations from a legal perspective.

Students explore the roles, forms, and structures of international organizations and acquire a critical perspective on the limitations of international organizations as well as the legal and practical challenges facing them.

Students become familiar with the debates associated with five international organizations (the UN, ICC, ASEAN, NATO, and the WTO).
