Course Description

This course explores what gender studies—and feminist studies in particular—teach us about the international sphere, and how they lead us to reexamine traditional subjects such as war, power, and security. To this end, the course uses a selection of foundational and more recent texts to introduce these fields, their questions, and their methods. Sessions are structured around interactive activities (oral exercises, both individual and group, and discussions) and lectures on feminist or gender studies in international relations. Focused on examining diverse cases and contexts, the course analyzes social movements (the #MeToo movement, the Iranian uprising, eco-feminism) and international public policies, whether originating from states (France’s “feminist diplomacy” or the projection of U.S. military power worldwide) or from international organizations (UN documents or European Union policies).
