Course Description

This course deepens understanding of cooperation, forms of governance, and political institutions in the contemporary international system and its evolution, using the various analytical tools provided by theories of international relations. It explores the diversity of international actors and the complex nature of their interactions within an international system profoundly transformed by the end of the Cold War, shifts in power, and new rivalries among states. In particular, drawing on the study of the various settings, types, and levels of international cooperation, the course identifies the challenges currently facing the classical model of the international system based on state sovereignty and formal multilateralism. At the same time, it examines the extent to which this shift toward multi-actor (public and private) and multi-site international cooperation (toward what are called “complex regimes”) is impacted by the intensification of inter-state tensions.
