Course Description

This course aims to introduce students to the central topics of the problem of knowledge in philosophy. To achieve this, the course will examine the subject from both historical and contemporary perspectives. A historical perspective will enable the student to understand the development of the debate on the possibility, origin, and essence of knowledge within modern philosophy, focusing on the main proponents of rationalism, empiricism, and critical philosophy. The contemporary discussion will consider the question of justification within the framework of analytic philosophy.
