Course Description

This course provides analysis of white-collar and corporate crimes and deviance. Such acts (or omissions) often occur within the context of international commerce and business, and may be facilitated at the transnational level through the use of offshore financial centers and "shell" firms or third parties in other jurisdictions. This course therefore critically examine the nature and organization of these crimes (e.g., the processes and practices necessary to carry them out), the key social actors involved (e.g., who are the "criminals," why do they do it, and who is being victimized?), and the mixture of responses to such crimes (e.g., enforcement, self-regulation, prevention/reduction, disruption/intervention) at the local, national, and transnational levels. To explore these issues, students examine a number of relevant in-depth case studies such as corporate corruption and bribery, tax avoidance/evasion, and modern slavery.
