Course Description

This course introduces the principles and significance of research methodology in anthropology, with an emphasis on both theoretical understanding and practical application. It covers designing and conducting anthropological research, using qualitative and, when relevant, quantitative approaches. Particular attention is given to fieldwork methods, ethical considerations, and the collection, analysis, and interpretation of anthropological data (interviews, participant observation, surveys, archives). The course also develops proficiency in organizing, processing, and critically analyzing information produced during research.
