Course Description

The course explores the relationship between history, fiction, and collective memory through the study of literature and film. Students examine how societies construct narratives about the past and how those narratives influence contemporary understandings of identity, politics, and social change. Topics include war and violence, gender, migration, human rights, power, resistance, and historical memory. Through readings, film analysis, and discussion, students develop a critical perspective on the ways cultural representations contribute to the interpretation and reconstruction of modern history.
